Z.O.A. Seeks Wider Aid Of Youth In "Greater Zionism" Plans

The Zionist Organization of America formulated plans for strengthening the Zionist movement in this country under a program of "greater Zionism." The program was adopted at the close of the sixty-first annual convention of the organization at the Deauville Hotel, in Miami Beach, Florida. Abraham A. Redelheim, of Brooklyn, N. Y., was elected president of the organization to succeed Dr. Emanuel Neumann, of New York.

The program of "greater Zionism" was based, says the New York Times, in large measure, on a series of recommendations made at an earlier session by Dr. Mordecai M. Kaplan, noted Jewish scholar, who headed the Organization's commission on basic Zionist ideology, charged with making a re-evaluation of the fundamental concepts of the Zionist movement.

The program calls for an intensified promotion of Hebrew culture, the enrollment of greater numbers of Jewish youth in the Zionist movement and the encouragement of private investment in Israel.

It stresses the "supreme importance of the centrality of Israel to the survival and spiritual enhancement of the Jewish people throughout the world," a concept

Israel Sees First Film With Sympathy To A Nazi

The film version of Irwin Shaw's "The Young Lions" was shown to packed houses in Jerusalem without major incident. The fact that showing of the film was permitted, and the way in which it was received showed how far the Israelis have come in ten years in their attitude toward anything German, says the New York Times.

Until the showing of "The Young Lions," Israel's Film Censorship Board had carefully cut from every picture any scenes that showed any sympathy toward a Nazi. Until two years ago any German-language film, regardless of its vintage or who made it, was banned. The decision to license "The Young Lions" was a painful one for the seventeen members of the board, who must approve each motion picture shown in Israel.

One of the leading characters in the film is a German army officer. Because he is disillusioned with the excesses of the Nazi movement, he is portrayed in a highly sympathetic light But opposite him is a bewildered American Jew, drafted into the army, who must fight against both the Germans and the crude anti-Semitism of an infantry company.

The film has some violent battle scenes and a brutal sequence showing the horrors of a concentration camp. This was potentially

N. Y. Post Switches Support Over "Pro-Arab And Anti-Israel" Charge By Candidate

Dorothy Schiff, publisher of "The New York Post," made a dramatic switch of support from the Democratic candidacy of Gov. Harriman, blaming his "snide insinuation that Nelson Rockefeller is pro-Arab and anti-Israel" for her last-minute action. She shifted her support in a front-page editorial addressed "To Post Readers," stating her reasons briefly and ending, "If you agree with me, do not vote for Averell Harriman tomorrow."

She made the change between editions of the paper, reports the New York Herald Tribune, after "The Post's" seventh, "final blue" edition had appeared listing Gov. Harriman at the very top of the newspaper's full-page list of "The Post's Election Choices."

In the next edition, the same full-page list appeared with the exception that no choice whatever was listed for either Governor or Lieutenant Governor. "The Post" had come out for Gov. Harriman in an editorial.

Gov. Harriman was on a handshaking tour in Jackson Heights, Queens, when he heard the news from a reporter who had just telephoned his newspaper. The Governor appeared stunned and had difficulty in making immediate comment. Later, in a formal statement, he said:

"Since Mr. Rockefeller has never been critical of the Dulles-Eisenhower policies, I hold him responsible for his part in these policies. I have never accused Mr. Rockefeller of being pro-Arab or anti-Israel, but I do charge him with his share of responsibility for the Dulles-Eisenhower policies which have had a serious adverse effect on our country."

Mr. Rockefeller, the Republican candidate, expressed delight at Mrs. Schiff's action.

Mrs. Schiff's statement said:

"Gov. Harriman's recent snide insinuation that Nelson Rockefeller is pro-Arab and anti-Israel should not be condoned by any fair-minded person. Rockefeller, far from being anti-Israel, has been a liberal contributor to the United Jewish Appeal for twelve years. It is deplorable but true that in political campaigns lower echelons on both sides indulge in vile demagoguery. But when the head of the ticket repeats such libels, he should be punished by the voters. If you agree with me, do not vote for Averell Harriman tomorrow."

The page one announcement was signed, "Dorothy Schiff, Publisher."

At the office of the newspaper a spokesman said that the Governor's so-called "insinuations" had been reported in that paper previously in an account of Gov. Harriman's appearance on the Barry Gray radio program over WMCA, says the New York Herald Tribune.

According to "The Post" account, written by Oliver Pilat, Gov. Harriman said "that Rockefeller was in the White House as an adviser on foreign affairs in 1954-'55 when the first appeasement of President Nasser of Egypt took place," and "that the 'big-business oil interests' had great influence on the changing of American policy in the Middle East from support of Israel to neutrality."

But in discussing Mrs. Schiff's withdrawal of support with reporters in Jackson Heights, the Governor indicated that he had made other remarks in a speech at Port Jervis, N. Y., which also touched on the subject of Israel.

"I said at Port Jervis that the Eisenhower administration was influenced by big business throughout and that in the Middle East the change from support of Israel to neutrality was due to the influence of the oil companies.

"I don't take back a word I have said, but I want to make it clear. I have simply stated the facts of the case, the change from pro-Israel to a neutrality position. That's the fact. I have said this was the reason for many of our difficulties including appeasement of Nasser and the expansion of the influence of the Kremlin."

It was at the busy intersection of Broadway and 74th Street, Jackson Heights, where subway lines and bus routes converge, that the Governor was shaking hands when he got the news, says the New York Herald Tribune. A reporter accompanying him happened to telephone his newspaper routinely at this point. He came rushing back to the Governor, who was chatting on the street, and told him the news with a request for comment.

The Governor was visibly shaken but, after hearing the reporter's details, replied:

"I've been critical of the Dulles-Eisenhower policy in the Middle East. For years I have been critical of the Dulles-Eisenhower policy in the Middle East — beginning with the fiasco of the Geneva conference, you know, the 'Geneva spirit.' I have pointed out that he (Rockefeller) was present at the Geneva conference and that he must be held responsible for that policy because he was one of the President's advisers at Geneva. And he never repudiated the Dulles-Eisenhower policy."

Neither Peace Nor Major War In Mideast Soon, Is Belief

Two years after the Sinai campaign Israel finds herself much better understood by the diplomats of the world and much better placed in the Middle Eastern arms race than in 1956. On the afternoon of October 29, 1956, Israeli paratroops began dropping far behind Egyptian lines in the Sinai Desert. Four days later Israeli soldiers had captured the entire Sinai Peninsula and were camping on the banks of the Suez Canal.

Later, in the face of international pressure, these troops were withdrawn and for months Israel was in bad repute with most of the world, says the New York Times. Assessing Israel's position at present, a Foreign Ministry source said: "We find now a new appreciation of Israel's grievances against Egypt. Among Western embassies there is a much greater understanding of our problems. In fact, we are even being permitted a little academic 'I told you so.' "

Israel has been able to buy arms from several sources that had been closed to her. She has been purchasing helicopters from the United States and two old submarines from Britain. A few days ago the director general of the Defense Department announced that Israel could now buy all the arms she needed if she had the funds to do so.

Along Israel's borders there have been fewer incidents in the past year than at any other time since statehood. The Gulf of Aqaba has remained open to Israeli shipping and for two years the Arabs have been unable to hinder the trade that has slowly been building up through the port of Elath.

"But aside from these material gains there are important intangibles that have developed since Sinai," the Foreign Ministry official said. "There is now the realization that Israel must not be allowed to get too desperate," he went on. "The Sinai campaign clearly demonstrated that Israel would strike out if she felt she had to. We believe now that many of our friends, particularly in the West, will do all they can to keep the pressures from again building up against us."

There is also the realization, the source added, that for the time being there are no real concessions Israel can make to satisfy the Arabs, reports the New York Times. The Israeli spokesman said the Sinai campaign had not accomplished one of its major objectives, the deflating of President Gamal Abdel Nasser. But it strengthened Israel's belief that in the near future there would be neither peace nor a major war in the Middle East, he said.

Rabbi Urges North Not To Condemn South Hastily

The question of human relations disturbs Dr. Julius Mark, the leader of Temple Emanu-El, the world's largest synagogue, in New York. He is suspicious of the word "tolerance" in this connection, since he feels that it implies an attitude of forbearance with arrogant overtones. He is hopeful, however, that persons who differ may learn to tolerate one another's views without prejudice.

America's major issue involves the respect of its citizens for decisions of the Supreme Court, Dr. Mark said in a recent interview with the New York Times in connection with his tenth anniversary as rabbinical leader of New York's largest and oldest Reform Jewish Congregation.

"The failure to establish brotherly relations among the races in America sickens one's heart," he said. "It is my hope that the next ten years will witness happier and more decent relations." He labeled as "a dastardly act by cowardly hoodlums" the recent bombing of The Temple, Reform Jewish Congregation, in Atlanta, Ga. He called it "an affront to everything that America stands for."

Noting that the bombing of a synagogue in Peoria, Ill., probably had been perpetrated by a mentally unbalanced individual, he pictured the Atlanta incident as part of a "different" situation. Rabbi Jacob M. Rothschild, of The Temple, had spoken in favor of integrating Negroes and whites in the public school system, Dr. Mark noted.

During his thirty-six-year ministry, he lived for twenty-two years in Nashville, Tenn., where he was rabbi of the Vine Street Temple. Asked about the bombings, Dr. Mark observed that while there is "no excuse for acts of desecration" to any religious edifice, the bombings were the "unhappy manifestation" of persons who were mentally ill.

He cautioned that the country's "decent" Southern citizens are "honestly trying" to solve problems of hatred and are "very much ashamed" when atrocities occur that "make their task more difficult." Northerners should not be "quick to condemn" the South for this and other problems.

Dr. Mark cited New York as "the most American of all cities." "New York is not, as a lot of people maintain a lonely city", he said to the New York Times. It is lonely only for the people who make it so. New York offers everything if you meet it half way.

"Here we have peoples of all races living together in harmony. The finest things are not the tall buildings, the great bridges and tunnels, the parks and streets, but the people who inhabit the city. New York offers an object lesson — people of diverse backgrounds living and working together for a common good."

In qualifying for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations, publishers are doing more than providing advertisers with the facts about the circulation of their publications.

They are also giving active support to the principle that advertising space should be bought and sold only on the basis of verified information — a principle that has contributed in large measure to the interests of all advertisers.

The Canadian Jewish Review is still the only Jewish publication in Canada printed in any language reaching the Jewish community which is able to claim membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations volatile material for viewers who had lost mothers and sisters in these camps or themselves had been in them. But the only audible reactions at one crowded showing this week were a few gentle hisses at some of the more sententious pronouncements of Marlon Brando as the German officer.

ISRAEL SEES

"We realized we were taking a risk in releasing this picture," Zeev Meljon, spokesman for the board told the New York Times. "We didn't believe that a Nazi such as Mr. Brando's character ever existed," he went on. "But we were in a difficult spot. You see, the film had been banned in Egypt because the Jewish soldier was shown in a very good light. I would have been a bit too ironic if we had banned it here for being pro-Nazi."

But the board still keeps a tight hold on other films involving Germany. It has a blacklist of German and Austrian film stars and directors who were Nazi sympathizers. It will not allow the showing of a film in which they participate. The board still will not license films that come directly from either East or West Germany. The modern German-language films that are permitted have been made by non-German companies or by joint German and foreign companies.

"We have yet to see an anti-Nazi picture from either Germany," Mr. Meljon said. "When we do, maybe we'll change our minds." Like the film review boards in many other countries, the Israeli board scans all movies for excessive sex, cruelty, or crime. In addition, it has other standards more typically Israeli. It will not pass any picture that is critical of any religion. Neither will it approve a film that ridicules another government, even an Arab government.

The board cut scenes from "The Robe" that, according to Mr. Meljon, "showed the glories of Christ at the expense of Judaism." It banned entirely "The Path of Glory" because the film "disparaged the French Army." Also banned was a picture showing that Stalin had not died but had flown to Greece with the Soviet treasury.

Yet, with an eye to Israel's large Arab-speaking audiences, the board licenses Egyptian films imported from a neutral country, says the New York Times. This week, in addition to "The Young Lions," five German-language films were being shown in Israel to large audiences.

"We would never have dared allow this five years ago," Mr. Meljon said. "But our audiences seem much more sophisticated now. Maybe it would be more accurate to say more tolerant. At any rate, they haven't dismantled any of our cinemas."

advanced by Dr. Kaplan, who is also a member of the faculty of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York.

A vote of the 750 delegates instructed the incoming administration of the Organization to appoint a committee for the implementation of the program.

Voted also was an appeal to the United States Government "to proclaim publicly support for Israel's political independence and territorial integrity and to make it unmistakably clear that aggression against Israel would be treated as a threat to our security."

Mr. Redelheim, in his acceptance address, warned of "growing assimilationist and anti-Zionist influences emerging in this country which must be combatted with all vigor if we are to preserve a virile and culturally creative Jewish community in this country."

RABBI URGES NORTH

Dr. Mark will be 60 years old on December 26. — "Everybody celebrates my birthday, even the gentiles." He was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, and served as a rabbi in South Bend, Ind., for four years and there married, Miss Margaret Baer in 1924. He served twenty-two years as rabbi of the Vine Street Temple in Nashville, Tenn. He served as a chaplain in the Navy from July 1, 1942, to December 16, 1945, and for two years was chaplain to the Pacific Fleet.

His son, Dr. James B. D. Mark, is chief resident in surgery in Yale Hospital and the father of a six-months-old girl, Margaret. His daughter, Margaret, is Mrs. Martin F. Heller, of Montclair, N. J.

Temple Emanu-El's Congregation has almost doubled during his tenure, which began in September, 1948, from 1,300 to 2,500 families. The Temple was founded in 1845. It is now at Fifth Avenue and Sixty-fifth Street.

On December 8, Dr. and Mrs. Mark will be feted at a dinner in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. The dinner chairman will be Lewis L. Strauss, former chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, says the New York Times. Co-chairmen will include Alfred R. Bachrach, Temple president; former Senator Herbert H. Lehman, who was the former governor of New York; Frederick F. Greenman, Walter S. Mack, Joseph M. Proskauer, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, publisher and chairman of the board of The New York Times; the Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Goldenson, the Temple's rabbi emeritus; and the Rev. Dr. Nathan A. Perilman, Temple rabbi. David Sarnoff, chairman of the board of the Radio Corporation of America, will be the toastmaster.

BEFORE THE STORM

BY LAMED SHAPIRO; TRANSLATED FROM THE YIDDISH BY CURT LEVIANT

At about 10.30 in the morning the steamer docked at Tartilov. The sky was clear and sunshine flooded the world. But no heat was felt on the lake. A wind played over the water; it stirred up big waves and freshened the air. Both sides of the pier were lined with long rows of boats and barges, big and small. Women sat on the pier selling bread, baigel, and fruit. A bit farther off was a stand where cigarettes, candy, soda and other such refreshments were sold.

I got into a row-boat. At the stern, near the rudder, sat the broad-shouldered boatman, a greyish, fifty-year-old Jew of average height. A sixteen-year-old boy, evidently the man's son, took the oars. "Begging your pardon, bend your head, please," the boatman warned me.

I did so and the row-boat, with the silent ease of a shadow, glided under the chain which anchored the wooden pier and went out into the open water. The boy worked the oars with long, slow strokes and, though we went against the wind and current, we moved forward quite quickly. The pier slid past. Some workers on the boats stared down at my straw hat and pince-nez, while others just gave me a quick glance and returned to their labor.

All sorts of boats were crossing the lake. A vessel, crowded with peasants, women, and children, was sailing up the lake. Close to the second pier floated a raft. From there the sad tones of a Little Russian folk-song rose and vanished into the air like the scent of flowers.

"Watch out for the waves," the boy said. I turned my head. The steamer moved away from the pier and caught up with us. Some of my acquaintances standing on deck lifted their hats. They disappeared so quickly I barely had time to wave back. A minute later our row-boat cut capers on the waves. The steamer was already in the distance, leaving in its wake a broad, tumbling path of yellowish foam and hanging above a thick rope of black smoke.

I began talking with the boatman. When I asked him if he was earning a living from his work, he said, "Well, you keep on living. I can't buy my wife pearls, but we've enough for bread. It's a bit hard, though, at Passover when the floods come."

"Why is that?" I asked. "That should be your good season."

"In civilized towns, yes," he said, "but it's different with us. Where our pier is the lake isn't deep. So it's during the floods that the ships can go right up to the pier. There's no work for us then, except, of course, if there's a man like you, for instance. We also cast a net once in a while. That helps too."

The last of the boats were left behind. Once in a while a barge loaded with timber floated past. A few blown-up, snow-white clouds along the western side of the blessed Ukrainian sky. Silence. "Sholem, if you're tired," the old man said, turning to his son, "I'll row a while." The boy smiled without answering.

The oars, covered with a thin, moving film of water, spoke for him. As before, he rowed with ease and with long, slow strokes. "Is this your son?" I asked the boatman. He nodded with pleasure. "Do you have any other children?" "My older son is over there on a barge," he motioned, with his head looking toward Tartilov. "I've also a fifteen-year-old girl at home."

He stopped speaking. His face clouded. Then he glanced at my hat, pince-nez, my hand-me-down clothes, and gave me a queer look. "Tell me, please," he suddenly said half-seriously, half-ironically, "excuse me for the question I'm going to ask. People like you don't believe in the world-to-come. Where then is your world of here and now?"

Surprised, I stared at him. "I don't understand your question," "You understand . . . the modern folk say that a man's dying is just the same as a dog's croaking. But some, at least, try to enjoy this world. Others, for some good reasons of their own, don't even do that."

I began to understand. "Spirituality and materialism have always existed," I said and, seeing that the man didn't understand the words, I added, "that is, the needs of the soul and the needs of the body. In these times, too, there are people who attend only to their souls, but now-a-days these souls get their sustenance from other sources." Noticing that the man wasn't listening, I stopped philosophizing. "But why did you mention this?" I asked him after a while.

The boatman answered, sunk in thought. "I also had a son." At first his reply made no sense but then it became clear. I asked carefully, "Had?" "Yes . . . he died," the boatman answered dully turning away. "Watch your rowing," he shouted angrily at his son, though the boy was rowing quite well. "You're just turning in circles."

I left the old man alone for a while, then, cautiously and gradually, I drew him into a conversation and he opened his embittered heart.

"To this day," he said, "I can't understand what sort of a person he was . . . . From childhood he wasn't like the other children . . . You think that I'm a born boatman? Once I was a merchant — dealt in wheat. But the wheel turned. . . . Yes, I kept him in Hebrew school. He plunged into his studies — knew no limit. I thought he would be a rabbi for sure, a very religious man, or a God-knows-what. I wasn't too happy about this because too much is too much. Right? But maybe I'm wrong! Well, it's the same old story — the boy wants to study so how can you say no? On the other hand, it's an honor to have a son in school.

Well, he studied and my old woman was filled with pride. For them, the women I mean, it's all joy. I'm telling you this, you see,

8 o'clock and all's well

This is the relaxing time of day. Work is miles behind me. I can smell the roast Irene has on the stove. I glance through the paper, one eye on TV. There's a glass of Canadian "74" Sherry in my hand.

Lovely wine, this. A smooth pleasant appetizer that sharpens the old taste buds. What I like about it too, is that it's a drink Irene and I can enjoy together. To us, it sort of lends a glow to an evening meal.

Innocents Abroad: Russian Jewish Tourists In Israel After 41 Years

BY EPHRAIM HENDOR, OF JERUSALEM

The news item was brief but it nevertheless made the front page of every Israeli newspaper. The gist of it was that a group of tourists from Russia were on their way to Israel where they would be spending a ten-day vacation. The dispatch also mentioned that there were a number of Jews in the party. In fact, all the twelve visitors, including the Intourist guide, turned out to be Jewish. There were ten men and two women in the group and they arrived from Paris on an Air France plane.

The official party awaiting them at the airport included the attaché of the Russian Embassy, representatives of the Israel-Soviet friendship societies, a representative of Peltours Travel Agency which was acting as Intourist's agent in Israel, a host of reporters and, not least, the American brother of one of the visitors scheduled to arrive. He told the press that some time ago his brother in Russia had written to him in the U. S. that he would be making a trip to Israel and so he had hurried here to meet him and had now been waiting two months for this great moment. He said that they had last seen each other in 1912.

As soon as they had boarded the plane in Paris they must have known that they would be the target of many curious and perhaps pointed questions. They themselves related that the other passengers on the Israel bound plane, when they learned that there was a group of Russian tourists in their midst, refused to believe it until the Russians duly produced their passports.

The first question which every reporter threw at the nearest Russian was, "How were you able to arrange this trip to Israel?" The answers given not only matched in every detail, but one not familiar with the fact that for 41 years the Russians have not permitted a single tourist group, let alone Jewish, to come to Israel would have found them entirely reasonable.

The general reply was somewhat as follows: "I went into the Intourist office and asked what tours were available abroad and was told that there were tours to Poland, Czechoslovakia, and several other countries, including Israel, so I decided to spend my holiday here." Lev Slutzky, the Intourist guide in charge of the group, said, "Since all of us are Jews we are naturally interested in seeing Israel and how the Jews live here." Mrs. Galina Shergova, a pretty woman from Leningrad who is on the staff of Ogonyok, a widely read, illustrated weekly, remarked, "We know very little about Israel and I came here because I was sure the trip would prove very interesting." Maxim Michlin of Minsk was quoted as saying, "If I had a choice of either England or Israel, obviously I would rather visit here."

The visitors from Russia, whose ages ranged between 40-60, came from the following cities: Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, and Minsk. Six of them were engineers and the remainder included a poet, a professor of botany at Leningrad University, a professor of domestic economics at the Moscow Institute, a journalist, and the Dean of the Kiev Polytechnical School. All of them were fluent in Yiddish, three of them could speak English and several said they knew a little Hebrew. The trip to Israel, they said, cost them 4,000 rubles each.

Accommodations for the Russian tourists were arranged at the Ramat-Aviv, one of Israel's swank resort hotels located on the outskirts of Tel Aviv. From the airport they were taken directly to the hotel where some special provisions were made for their reception. The management had hired a Russian-speaking chambermaid and a small bottle of vodka was placed in each of the rooms occupied by the visitors. Most of them declared that they did not drink so we learn that at least in one respect the Jews in Russia are no different from Jews elsewhere. Several of them who are building engineers immediately got busy looking over the premises of the hotel, inspecting walls, drainage, and the air-conditioning system. Generally, they were impressed with the quality of the construction.

During their first day of sightseeing the visitors, who had a small bus at their disposal, were shown a dyeing plant in Ramat Gan, a Mothercraft Center in Tel Aviv, and the Beilinson Hospital near Petach Tikvah where they exchanged comments with staff and patients. They remarked that they had heard much about Israel's high standard of medical services and the medical research being done here. The day ended with a reception for the visitors at the Russian Embassy.

One afternoon they visited the Histadrut headquarters. Here they met with several members of the executive who answered their questions about the structure of the Histadrut, employment problems, productivity, etc. The discussion then shifted to other topics, such as reparations from Germany and whether the Histadrut was opposed to certain "chauvinistic tendencies" which led to discrimination against children of mixed parentage in Israel.

It was clear that on certain issues they had been "informed" through the Russian press. The newspapers did not report the explanations that were given to the visitors, nor how these were received. Later they toured the Weizmann Institute where they met with a number of scientists and paid their respects at the grave of Chaim Weizmann.

The press gave detailed news coverage to all their movements and one incident seemed to indicate that they were being supplied with a translation of everything which was being written about them. When one of the newspapers reported that Mrs. Sophia Frei (she proudly announced that she knew her name in Hebrew was Sara Bat Evi), who is a professor of domestic economics at the Moscow Institute, earned 1,200 rubles a month, she asked the newspaper to correct the error as her actual earnings were 1,600 rubles a month.

One of the highlights of the trip, at any rate for the Israeli public, was their visit to Jerusalem. David Sheposhnikov, Professor of Botany at the University of Leningrad, was invited to give a lecture at the Hebrew University which was attended by some 200 people. To the delight of the audience he opened his lecture with a few words in Hebrew and then proceeded in English.

Now that this visit is over and the Russians have returned home, no one seems to be any the wiser as to the import of this event. Were the members of this tour group really innocents abroad who came here as a result of private decisions without any bearing on the overall policies and attitude of the Soviet authorities towards Israel and Jews of Russia? They, it is clear, had been anxious to leave that impression. Concerning the relations between Israel and Russian Jewry, one of the visitors was quoted as follows:

"The Jews in Russia are not thinking about emigration to Israel. The bad times have passed and things are steadily improving for the Jews in Russia. The adult generation is well established and not ready to abandon its present way of life. As for the younger people they know that Israel is a capitalist country." That presumably was meant for those who may harbor the notion that Jews from Russia may want to come to Israel.

Perhaps at some later date we shall know what sort of message they have taken back with them from Israel. One can surmise that it won't be overly enthusiastic for, judged solely in a material sense there is perhaps little here to impress those who come from a land where so much has been achieved in this respect. It requires a feeling for the drama of Jewish history, a love of the Jewish people, and a pride in being a Jew to find a deeper significance in what the reborn Jewish state has accomplished. To the extent that these attributes have already been lost to a good part of Russian Jewry, it will prove difficult to find a common language with them.

Their visit here was, nevertheless, a heartening event. It may augur a change in Russian policy that will see increasing numbers of Jewish tourists coming here from the Soviet Union as they do from elsewhere. Someone has suggested that perhaps the Russian rulers are prepared to compete with Israel more fairly for the allegiance of their Jewish nationals by allowing them to visit here because they feel confident that the Jews of Russia are as much a part of that nation as American Jews are of the United States.

But the above thesis ignores the fact of growing anti-Semitism in the Soviet which has driven many Jews towards an affirmation of their national identity, or at least a greater awareness of themselves as Jews. It is difficult to correlate the spread of anti-Semitism in Russia with the hypothesis that the rulers are now prepared to allow the Jewish population to maintain contact with Jews abroad and with Israel.

This little episode has an enigmatic touch before which even the most astute observer may feel non-plussed. Only the future will tell whether the visit of this first group of Russian Jews justifies the hopeful implications which some are ready to ascribe to this event.

because he was always a strange creature. Later, when he took to modern learning, he also sank into it tooth and nail. He threw away the Talmud and went far, far from that field. At first it pleased me a bit, for these days you need a worldly education. But my old woman was against it. 'Remember, Chaim Aaron,' she screamed, 'you're allowing it! He's going to become a non-believer.'

So I thought: what can you do? She's a woman. . . . But, may I live and be well, she was right."

The old man was silent. The sun rose higher. The water moved listlessly and lazily between the piers. From all sides, solitary and silent, white clouds gathered slowly along the horizon. A summer noon reigned mightily over the world. "Well, what then? How did he turn out?" I asked the boatman.

He lifted his head. "What was there to turn out? He didn't become a saint. . . . My wife put a match-stick in the folds of his prayer-bag. It lay there for two weeks. Naturally, I really laid into him. Why don't you pray, you heathen? God knows, I'm not so religious myself but what Jew doesn't pray with phylacteries? You want to study? Very nice. I don't forbid it, but what kind of thing is this? Better not to have any knowledge and be a blockhead but you know what's right and wrong, you're studied so many years and all of a sudden you stop praying? But, as it is written, 'All who come to her will not return' — when you stray from the path, you can't return. So he strayed completely.

"From that day on, there was no peace between us. He didn't give in, and when I started laying into him, he ran away somewhere and stayed away for ten months. It hurt me a lot. After all, it was my own flesh and blood. And the heart aches. And besides, my wife nearly ate me up alive. She turned on me — threw the whole blame on me. 'You're a father, you should have known. But now you shouldn't have touched him. Now you've made him run away from home.' A mother — not hard to understand.

"I thought, who knows? Maybe I did overstep my bounds. When he came back I didn't touch him, but it made me sick. All right, you don't pray a whole year. But at least for Rosh Hashona go to the synagogue. Are all days alike? But if nothing — then completely nothing. It happens to people, especially now-a-days, that children aren't the way you want them to be. But there's a limit. And what happened to me happened to no one else.

"He had one good quality, though. He wasn't . . . I mean . . . he didn't go satisfying his desires like the young man today, chasing after the devil-knows-what. That I didn't see him do. Just the opposite. Even on this point he went overboard and things which belonged to the world of hare and now didn't enter his head. To think about a goal for himself or something — absolutely nothing. He refused to listen to any talk about marriage.

"So this is what I say: if you don't devote yourself to God, at least devote yourself to people. If you don't think of the world to come, let me see you earning money, living nicely. A man has to be something. In short, I got sick of arguing with him. I didn't let it bother me any more. Do what you want! Maybe the world will make a man out of you, I thought.

"At first, I used to get a couple of letters from him from Krementchug. He was a teacher, that is, he taught boys and girls writing and earned a bit. Well, well, very nice. Anyway, it was a start. Suddenly he stopped writing. A month passed, then two and three. We don't see him or hear from him. Then someone tells me that he was seen in St. Petersburg. Later he was seen in Kiev. Good God, I thought, what sort of farce is this? I mean, why don't you stay in one place and why don't you write? Let me know, too, where you are and what you're doing. After all, we're somewhat related, right? But what can you do? If he doesn't write, he doesn't write. Live and be well!

"Meanwhile, my brother and his wife happened to take a trip to Kiev to see a doctor. On their way back, my brother comes and says to me, 'You know where your darling is now?'

"'Quiet! Why that tone in your voice with that word darling? He's just as good as any of your children.'

"'What do you mean?' he says, 'He's better. Listen to what Feivel the Shoemaker says: they have jailed him.'

"Well, what could I say? It just about killed me. That's all I needed with my clothes of silk — a jailbird. But, thinking it over, I say to myself: he's not a thief. The important thing for the folk today is conscience. So why should they jail him? It doesn't make sense. When I started asking questions I became numb with fright. . . . As it turned out, the Czar didn't meet with his favor. I wish it on my enemies! What do you care about the Czar? Where do you come to these things?

"Then I figured, the boy's gone crazy and they probably had to put him in the madhouse. I ran here and there asking if I could get to see him. So they tell me, it's better not to burn my fingers. Can you imagine? I thought I'd go crazy. Just to have a word with him! Who knows? Maybe they'd shoot him for a thing like that, you understand?

"Later they freed him and he went away somewhere. For two years I didn't see him. Finally, a year ago last Passover, he came back. Seeing him ripped my heart out. He was as dead as all the dead . . . Thin and drawn — skin and bones. Something was wrong with his lungs. He spat blood. But as happy and joyful as if nothing. . . . And so tender and kind to everyone — not like other sick people who are always angry and irritable.

"He asked how I was. He played with my older boy's children, sang fine old songs. . . . The kids got to love him. And this little one" — the old man pointed to his son who had put away the oars and had bent down as if looking for something in the boat — "never left his side. My old woman couldn't find any peace. She kept looking at the boy and the tears poured out of her. And me? What do you think? My blood seeped out of me. One time I couldn't control myself and said, 'Son, what did you have against us and against yourself? Why did you have to ruin yourself?' He lowered his head and said that it had to be so.

"'What do you mean: it had to be so? How can you bring yourself to such a state? You're committing suicide purposely. Go ahead, tell me. Let me know, too, why it has to be so! You want to remake the world? Did you create it?'

"He answered that I would never understand but that he would discuss it with me another time. Now he had no strength. So I left him alone. But we never got to talk about that subject for in a couple of weeks he came home one night and said he had to go away. . . . They were looking for him. There was a wailing in the house. My old woman, we couldn't tear her away from him. My older son and I rowed across the lake.

"On the other side a wagon was waiting. As he started saying his goodbyes and said, 'Forgive me, papa, for all the pain I've given you; it couldn't have been otherwise,' I could not control myself and cried like a baby. 'Son,' I begged, 'stay at home. I'll beg them, I'll get down on my knees . . . you'll tell them that you won't . . .' I no longer knew what I was saying. He only smiled at my words and embraced me in such a way that — honestly — I felt as if he were the father and I were the son. Then he kissed his brother and left."

The old man suddenly fell silent. After a while he concluded with: "Two months later I got a letter with his things from a little town in Lithuania. The letter said he was dead."

"Grab hold of the wharf," Sholem said to his father. "I think we can get off here." The front of the boat faced the wharf. We were just in time. The clouds were slowly forming into one mass, getting darker and darker. From time to time, the far-off, angry sounds of a storm were heard. The sun had disappeared. The lake awoke from its heavy slumber and began moving restlessly and nervously. The wind became sharper.

What Price Intermarriage?

BY SOL. LIPTZIN

"Mixed Marriage And The Jewish Future," by David Kirshenbaum, is not a scientific study based on documentary or statistical research but a book of deep insight based upon three decades of keen observation by a religious leader in London, Ontario. The facts he marshals can be duplicated in many communities of Canada and the United States. The conclusions he arrives at are deeply disturbing.

Recent studies of the American Jewish scene have called attention to the successful integration of the Jew into the New World scene during the past half century, so that anti-Semitism is today but a mild irritant and goodwill is everywhere in evidence. As a result, youth of the post-war generation has a choice, or believes it has a choice, which its immigrant forefathers did not have to the same degree. It can escape from Jewishness and it does so most frequently via intermarriage. Or it can choose freely and gladly to accept the burden and the blessing of Jewishness to which it fell heir at birth.

Of the two possibilities — escape from Jewishness or rediscovery of Jewishness — the former seems the easier way out of the cultural dilemma in which the well integrated young American or Canadian of Jewish origin finds himself today. The author proves that this is an erroneous view. He points out by means of numerous illustrations that the effort to escape via intermarriage creates more problems than it solves.

Awareness of differences between Jew and non-Jew is present in our cultural milieu and no person is wholly immune from emotional preference for his own historical or ethnic or religious group, regardless whether such preference be logical or illogical. Under the impact of great passion, differences between Jewish and non-Jewish mates may be temporarily glossed over, but they linger on at the subconscious level and fester there. In moments of stress and strain, which occur now and then in the course of married life, these differences break through and cause irreparable damage to the individuals involved and to their children.

The tragedy to the family, however, is only part of the story. The Jewish group, which is the sum of the Jewish families in a community, also suffers severe dislocation. Indeed, the author holds that intermarriage is now reaching the point where it threatens the survival of entire communities.

A few have already been decimated beyond hope of recovery and, unless the apathy of the Jewish public is dispelled and a strong dam is set up to stop the flood of intermarriages, many more communities will disintegrate; the synagogues, now frequented mostly by the aged and the aging, will be empty or transformed into Christian congregations "of Jewish descent."

Statistics still count more than five million Jews in America. But how many of them, asks the author, can be included in the final accounting of Jewish survival? "How many have already left us spiritually and can be dropped from this count? How many have vanished without trace into the environment? How many have led their children to marriage in the church? How many are members of churches?"

Although exact statistics are unobtainable, the author calls attention to "lost tribes" of Jews on this continent and to prominent church leaders of Jewish origin. His numerous stories of individual cases of intermarriage which were brought to his notice as rabbi, and generally too late, make fascinating reading.

Kirshenbaum has become convinced that the decay of the once closely knit Jewish family is mainly responsible for the alarming rise in mixed marriages and that the inadequacy of Jewish education is the second most important cause.

Additional factors weakening the will to survival as Jews are the equating of Hanukkah and Christmas, the minimizing of differences between religions, the rapid waning of a common Jewish language, the deleting of ethnic peculiarities and special historic characteristics in the mad rush to conform, the emphasis upon Good Will Movements and Brotherhood activities, the constant adjustment of Jewishness to appease the non-Jew, the chaos and duplication of the Jewish organizational structure both on a national and on a local level, the absence of a common purpose embracing the totality of American Jewry.

There are, of course, also cultural forces working for Jewish regeneration and rejuvenation in America. The author is not unaware of such forces as the impact of Israel or the return of estranged Jews from a religious limbo to traditionalism. By sounding an alarm, however, he hopes to counteract apathy and decay and to strengthen the regenerative processes.

Kirshenbaum's cry of anguish stressing the waywardness of American Jewry is unlikely to find as many readers as do the current books written by the talented exponents of Jewish self-hatred. But the few thousands who will read his analysis and conclusions in this stimulating book will ponder often and long on the still uncertain future of the Jew in America.

Rabbis Praise Pope For Saving Jews From Hitler

Gratitude was voiced in New York for the saving of thousands of European Jews in Roman Catholic monasteries and convents during the Hitler era through the intervention of the late Pope Pius XII. Preaching at Temple Israel, 210 West Ninety-first Street, the Rev. Dr. William F. Rosenblum declared that the "five hundred million Catholics the world over form a spiritual government that can always wield an influence on the side of understanding and peace."

"One of the most poignant examples of this," he added, "was during the Hitler holocaust when Pope Pius made it possible for thousands of Jewish victims of Nazism and Fascism to be hidden away in the monasteries and convents of the various Catholic orders and for Jewish children to be taken into their orphanages."

The rabbi recalled his visit to Rome ten years ago to express his gratitude on behalf of Jewish organizations for the Pope's humanitarian efforts, says the New York Times. He lauded the late Pope as "a great religious leader whose work for brotherliness and peace in a time of crisis in our history should remain as an example for all religious leaders to emulate."

At Temple Emanu-El, Sixty-fifth Street and Fifth Avenue, the Rev. Dr. Julius Mark, senior rabbi, said on behalf of the congregation's members, trustees, officers and rabbis that Pope Pius XII was "possessed of a brilliant mind, a compassionate heart, and a dedicated spirit." "He gave of himself generously and self-sacrificingly to the sacred task of establishing world peace founded on justice," the rabbi added.

In a sermon, based on the Biblical story of Cain and Abel, Dr. Mark said: "If peace is to come into a world striving to extricate itself from the darkness in which it is enshrouded, it will come only when men and nations have grasped the answer, namely that man is his brother's keeper. This is man speaking and living through the deeper wisdom of the heart."

"We Jews extend the hand of sympathy to Catholics on the passing of the Pope, for the Pope was a good example of man at his highest," said the Rev. Dr. Edward E. Klein at the Stephen Wise Synagogue, 30 West Sixty-eighth Street.

"Other such men as Albert Schweitzer, a Protestant, and Rabbi Leo Baeck are also examples of men at their highest," he added. "We can't all be saints and we can't all ascend to rarified heights, but we can be true to our spiritual lives and remember that every day of every year we stand in the light of God."

In a sermon on brotherhood, reports the New York Times, Dr. Klein said: "Man has the freedom of will to choose either good or evil and often, unfortunately, man chooses evil. We are free to love our neighbors. No matter what we are, black, white or yellow, Adam is our common ancestor."
